Farmer Sugar-Coats Crop and Sweetens Family Business

In his barn-turned-assembly line, Paul Moyer spots one caramel-and-chocolate-coated Mutsu apple on a tray. Lines of dark chocolate are artfully swirled around the fruit. To a chocolate lover, it looks beautiful, but the Vineland, Ontario, farmer sees it differently. The way his employee applied the chocolate is more time-consuming than the preferred technique of drizzling it overtop of the apple. That extra time cuts into profits. Paul may need to curtail this employee's artistry.

For the ninth-generation Niagara-region farmer, every penny counts. "Farming's been tough the last 20 to 25 years," Paul said. "We're getting the same amount for apples we did 20 years ago. We thought, 'Is there any way we could do value-added things?'"

"Value-added" has become a familiar term for those trying to make a living on the family farm. It means something extra is added to a product so you can increase its price and, therefore, its profitability.

Paul wanted to turn apples from a crop he could barely break even on to something that could sustain him and his family. In the mid-1990s, he began selling traditional sugar-syrup candy-coated apples at Ontario Place, a major tourist site in Toronto. Realizing the potential of the tried-and-true treat, he began selling them wholesale to other customers: Darien Lake Theme Park, the SkyDome (now Rogers Centre), Howell's Pumpkin Farm in Fonthill and Chudleigh's Entertainment Farm in Milton.

But the apples' shelf life, before they spoiled, was only three days. So, in 2005, Paul revamped the operation by dipping apples in caramel and milk chocolate and finishing them with enough white and dark chocolate drizzle to make chocoholics swoon. When two western New York grocery-store giants and Canada's Loblaw Companies became interested in his product, this entrepreneur seemed to have overcome the risks of farming.

However, Paul faced a new set of challenges. The demand for the caramel-chocolate apples had grown larger than his ability to produce them. “This is our facility,” Paul said, gesturing to his tiny 100-year-old barn, filled with the rather un-barnlike smell of caramel. Paul’s business needed to expand, but that would take more money.

Paul’s 11-year-old daughter, Sabrina, suggested an answer—a reality television show on which a panel of millionaires listens to entrepreneurs’ business plans and decides whether to offer investment money for expansion. In the spring of 2008, the Moyers took a chance. After three makeup touch-ups during eight-and-a-half hours waiting in a TV studio, Paul, Sabrina and Paul’s mother, Liivi, were finally able to make their pitch to five of Canada’s most successful names in business.

7

“As you’re walking across the top [of the set] and going down the stairs, you think, ‘Wow, this is it.’ . . . You’re excited to present to them, but they know their numbers and their business. At the same time, I know my numbers and my business. They grilled us pretty hard, but because I not only grow the apples and melt the chocolate and caramel and know the [sales] . . . I believe I answered all their questions exactly the way I hoped,” said Paul.

8

Paul’s professionalism and his product samples had a positive impact. “It was quite inspiring to see that these people had come up with a spin-off business,” said Dianne Buckner, the show’s host. “The candy-apple business was really an original thing to do, and they were basically taking their expertise and fashioning a new type of venture. It was great to see that people are being adventurous and creative in a way that makes that agricultural lifestyle work for them.”

9

Thanks to the panel’s response, the 209-year-old Moyer family farm remains a successful example of sustainable local agriculture.

Hearing him chortle, Rita turned toward Byron. 1

“You rarely get a laugh from the newspaper these days. 2
What’s so funny?” she asked.

“A 23-year-old rapper named Roland Pemberton has been 3
made Poet Laureate of Edmonton.”

“A poet what?” 4

“A poet laureate celebrates official events by writing 5
about them.” Byron paused. “This is what Pemberton said about the job: ‘Poet Laureate—whoa. Getting heavy. Do I need a staff and a big grey beard?’” Byron chuckled again. “Rita, you like hip hop music. Ever heard of him by his stage name—Cadence Weapon?”

“Yeah. Cadence released an album over the Internet, and he has at least two others. He 6 often raps about Edmonton. His first big hit, ‘Oliver Square,’ is about an Edmonton mall.”

Rita shook her head. “He’s definitely skilled with words, but he’s not someone you’d 7 expect for that job.”

Byron glanced up from the page. “Pemberton is replacing someone you would expect 8 in the job—a 74-year-old professor who’s published 29 books and won the Governor General’s Award for poetry.”

The paper rustled as Byron brought it closer. “But Pemberton’s got a point when he says 9
‘If people see me as representing Edmonton, maybe it will give them an overall different perception. I think that’s a positive thing. And it’s getting people talking.’”

“His appointment must have ruffled a few feathers,” said Rita. 10

“Well, he’s not worried if people are upset. He says he’ll challenge anyone to a poem 11 battle, ‘a poem-off,’ as he calls it.”
